Under Name In economics, a good is a material that satisfies human wants[1] and provides utility, for example, consumer making a purchase while getting an enough-satisfying Product. A common distinction is made between tangible and intangible goods, which are non-physical.[2] Commodities may be used as economic goods but often refer to marketable raw materials and primary products.[3] A tangible item that is useful to people but scarce in relation to its demand, so that human effort is required to obtain them. Although in economic theory all goods are considered tangible, in reality certain classes of goods, such as information, only take intangible forms. For example, among other goods an apple is a tangible object, while a patent belongs to an intangible class of goods and can be perceived only by means of an instrument such as a patent certificate.
